movement," and that may be carried on to any extent and yet leave other great questions to be settled by society. Of course the first great political question is what part the law ought to take. If we suppose all drinking shops to be abated on any one day or year, they might arise again.

A controversy of this sort is perpetnal in every sense in its very nature-Society must, in the end, determine whether it will interfere at all by law, and if it does, in what way. The law for many years. Not only that but it interferes in some way stringently and severely. That point is settled. But spect is directly in issue, and from the there remains open (and upon which there are various opinions) the question in what way shall the law interfere? There is a large party of Prohibitions and that party is increasing. Then stantly being carried on. there is a party of licensists, who think the best way to regulate or prevent the
